The European Central Bank has started buying asset-backed securities as of Friday this week in an attempt move to make banks provide loans and revive the economy. The program is the first step in a strategy which ECB chief Mario Draghi hopes will expand its balance sheet by up to 1 trillion euros. It is already buying covered bonds, a secure form of debt often backed by real estate.

Initial claims for jobless benefits declined more than expected in the most recent week, while consumer prices remained unchanged in October. The number of Americans making new claims for the unemployment aid fell less than expected last week, but continued to indicate strengthening labor market conditions. Initial claims for the state unemployment benefits slipped 2,000 to a seasonally adjusted 291,000 for the previous week.

As noticed from the daily chart; the market has been advancing in a broader channel since 2008. However after reaching the higher boarder at 103.50 on April 2013, marker declined till the level of 86.60s, starting from this point the market return to advance fuelled by the BoJ recent decisions (which has been discussed on the previous reports). The higher probability will be on the side of more rising markets and targeting 104.20s and 105.30s, however, any decline under 99.50 would give more probability for further decline
